"We are almost incurably convinced that the use of notebooks is essential to the learning process. This, however, was not the case in the first century. At that time, it was often held that if a man had to look something up in a book he did not really know it. The true scholar was a person who had committed to memory the things he had learned. Until a man had a teaching in his memory he was not considered really to have mastered it."
